

Pradeep Kumar <kpkonnet@gmail.com>

🌟 Daily Inspiration: Rohan and the Lost Purse of Chandni Chowk

1 message

kpkonnet@gmail.com <kpkonnet@gmail.com>
To: kpkonnet@gmail.com

Mon, Jul 6, 2026 at 11:17 PM

🌟 Daily Inspiration 🌟

A motivational story just for you!

Rohan and the Lost Purse of Chandni Chowk

The afternoon sun beat down on Chandni Chowk market, a vibrant tapestry of sounds and smells. Ten-year-old Rohan, with a smudge of dirt on his cheek and an eager glint in his eyes, was helping his father arrange fresh vegetables at their small stall. The air buzzed with excited chatter, the aroma of spices mingled with the sweet scent of jasmine, and the clang of vendors calling out their wares filled the narrow lanes.

Suddenly, Rohan spotted something glinting under a pile of discarded vegetable leaves near their stall – a small, embroidered purse. He picked it up. It felt heavy. Opening it carefully, he saw a wad of crisp rupee notes and a few crumpled slips of paper, likely important documents. His heart fluttered. His family often struggled to make ends meet, and this was a significant amount of money. For a fleeting moment, a thought whispered in his mind – "No one saw you pick it up."

But Rohan quickly pushed the thought away. His Amma always taught him that honesty was the truest wealth. He imagined how worried the owner must be. He looked at his father, busy weighing tomatoes for a customer. "Papa," he began, holding up the purse, "I found this."

His father, a man of quiet integrity, looked at the purse and then at Rohan. "Well, son, we must find its owner. Someone must be very anxious."

Rohan nodded with determination. He spent the next hour, weaving through the crowded market, asking shopkeepers and passersby if they had lost a purse. Many shook their heads, some eyed him suspiciously, but Rohan didn't give up. Just as hope began to dwindle, he approached an elderly saree vendor, Mrs. Sharma.

"Excuse me, Ma'am," Rohan asked politely, "have you or anyone you know lost a purse?"

Mrs. Sharma, her face etched with worry, looked up. "A purse? Oh, my dear boy, yes! I was just about to close my shop and realized my purse, with all my day's earnings and my ration card, was gone! I've been so worried sick." Tears welled in her eyes.

Rohan's face lit up. "Is it a small embroidered purse, Ma'am, with flowers on it?"

Mrs. Sharma gasped. "Yes, yes! That's the one!"

Rohan carefully handed her the purse. Mrs. Sharma checked its contents, her hands trembling. All her money and documents were intact. A wave of relief washed over her face. She hugged Rohan tightly. "Thank you, thank you, my child! You are an angel! Please, take this." She tried to press a few rupee notes into his hand.

Rohan gently refused. "No, Ma'am. It was the right thing to do. My Amma always says honesty is its own reward."

Mrs. Sharma smiled, her eyes twinkling. "Indeed it is. But please, take these." She picked up a small packet of Rohan's favourite motichoor laddoos from her stall and pressed them into his hand. "For your honesty, and for making an old woman's heart happy."

Rohan, blushing slightly, accepted the laddoos. As he walked back to his father's stall, the setting sun cast a golden glow over Chandni Chowk. The laddoos tasted sweet, but the feeling of doing something good, of easing someone's worry, was even sweeter. He knew his Amma would be proud.

💡 Moral: Honesty is a virtue that not only brings peace to your own heart but also shines a light of trust and integrity in the world, reminding everyone that goodness always finds its way back.

Sent with ❤️ by Daily Inspiration Mailer

July 06, 2026